the African Coast, but went ashore near St. George, Bermuda, in a fog. Wreckers came to her assistance and she was got off and the wreckers, the Virginian was boarded by a Licutement from the Skipjack, who, in the absence of the master and mate, proceeded to search the vessel, on alleged suspicion that she was a slaver

The Lieutenant noted in the Virginian's log book, that "having noticed several articles in the hold, leading to the suspicion that she might be engaged in the slave trade, he placed an officer and a guard on board." The next day he boarded the brig again and made the following notation in her log book.

Seven A. M.—Returned on board this vesset, where I found the mate, but no captain or papers, those being on shore at St. George's the salvers being about to navigate the vessel into that port, I directed the guard to assist therein; while proceeding thither I examined the papers at the United States acting Consul's office, and, on seeing the captain, found him unable to give any vouchers for the legality of the purpose to which seventy-three water-casks, some with salt and some with fresh water, were to be applied; the aptain then consenting to an examination of his hold in presence of the United States acting Consul, we again boarded the vessel at about half-past ten A. M., and removed so much of the cargo as to certify myself that the vessel had not the materials for a slave deck on board, nor did we meet with other the vessel had not the materials for a slave deck on board, nor did we meet with other matter for suspicion beyond the presence of an unusually large quantity of stores and provisions also, as cargo, much rice; but the interior of the respective casks and packages were not inspected, nor was any search made for money or papers; and at half-past one P. M., the vessel being then at anchor in St. George's Harbor, I removed the guard and quitted the vessel. "J. MURRAY, Lieut. Com. H. B. M. S.

In the evening of the same day the Lieu tenant boarded the brig again and placed a guard on board. Two days after the Captain made a written protest to the United States Consul, demanding protection and redress and resigning the command of the vesse while she was detained. The Consul de clined to receive the resignation of any prop erty or to incur any expense on the part of the Government for the Captain or crew touching the legality of the voyage was pending. Five days after the first seizure the Captain wrote to the New York owner that the Lieutenant had withdrawn his men, but he knew not how long be should remain free from inat first had agreed to receive $500 for their services, finding that it was a case of free | a cent? plunder, put the brig in the Admiralty Court, which makes the detention, as well as the claim, indefinite.

We call attention to the evidence on which legality of the purpose of seventy-nine water casks, some with salt and some with fresh What vouchers could be found in any case? Whalers bound for whaling waters fill their oil casks with salt water. Suppose the Skipjack had overhauled one of them, what youchers would be have found for the legality of the purpose of the casks? hooks for sugar casks, but no vouchers for the legality of their purpose. The Virginia was bound for the coast where palm oil is the principal article of commerce. It would be as sensible to ask for vouchers for the legality of purpose of empty gunnybags.

All the other evidence which the Lienten ent alleges, to prove that the vessel was a slaver, was an unusually large quantity of stores and provisions, and "as cargo much race." He found no lumber for a slave deck, nor any unusual provision of cooking apparatus, and the papers were all regular. In short, with just such a cargo as was adapte to the regular commerce with the coast, with legal papers, and without a folitary suspicious ircumstance about her, this American vessel was seized and her voyage ruined, as well as her owner, unless he happens to be rich enough to stand losses. Any small vessel owner, or captain, sailing his own craft and trading partly on credit, would be ruined by such an operation.

Our nation boasts of having made war against the British to resist the search of our vessels; but now, if they will only allege a aspicion, they may not only search but make prizes of our vessels. We instigate auspicion by making prize-money of our own vessels for those who will suspect them. Was ever such an insane and suicidal practice susfained by any people? If it had resulted in any good to humanity, it might be some palliation, but we doubt if any person will eriolisty affirm that the attempt to imppress the alave-trade has resulted in any good. That the trade is as flourishing as ever, i well known; our philanthropy has created the horrors of the middle passage, and that tem which makes mere suspicion a cover for any outrage, would have forced our nation into a war to protect our commerce.

But the most curious feature of this matter is that the South should be so strenuous for a system which makes piracy of a trade by which they originally acquired their slaves, and subjects all our vessels in the African trade, legal or illegal, to confiscation. It would seem that they thought it necessary to atone for the sin of holding slaves by visiting severe penalties on the trade by which they acquired them. Ultimately there is no difference in principle between bolding slaves and making them to her assistance and she was got off and nor between abolition of slavery and abolitaken to a proper anchorage. While the tion of the slave-trade. Eternal principles mester and mate were on shore settling with are not supposed to be limited by precise metes and bounds, and the principle on which the South hold their slaves, has only to be made amphibious, and it will cover the African slave-trade. Slaves are just as legally and properly bought in Africa as in Virginia. But what we desire is to protest against a false philauthropy, which destroys our own commerce, which has resulted in nothing but horrors to the negro, and which only perpet uates the slave-trade in the present horrible way in which it is carried on. A game which allows the British to monopolize all the commerce with the African Coast, and her naval officers to make prize-money out of American vessels which do not have vouchers for their water casks, and which do not go on a trading voyage to Africa empty handed, is a very nice one for them to play at but the fun has been carried on at our expense quite long enough, and our Govern-ment should get rid of this entangling alliance as soon as possible.

A Model Per-Capita Argument, With the Caput Left Out.

The Times announces another agitation of the per-capita question, and states the argument against any release of the people from paying a tax to the city for using the highway, with its usual debility. The syllabus of the argument is as follows:

The roads will pay under existing contracts; therefore the stock is good. The owners never intended a legitimate business they designed a grand stock speculation; in that they will fail until their contracts are abrogated. Why? Because the roads can not pay under existing contracts. Therefore the stock is flat.

The thing goes round and round like coffee-mill. But the most brilliant argument is that the City Council had no right to fix the rate of fare; therefore, if they modify the contracts, they will lose the control of fares, and the Companies will put it up as high as they please. Well, if the city had no right to regulate fares, how did it acquire any? If it while the decision of Her Majesty's authorities | had none, it has none still; nor any right to collect one cent from every citizen who uses the streets. If the city is collecting this polltax illegally, would it not do better to reease it in favor of the people, by a modifica ion of the contracts now, than to force the Companies to throw themselves on their legal trusion. In the meantime the salvers, who | rights, in which event they might, perhaps, collect present fare without paying the city

But the worst drivel is that the people ar opposed to any change in the per capita for their benefit. That the people of Cincinnati should insist on paying one cent to the this voyage has been ruined. The Lieuten-ant states that he "found no vouchers for the amounting, as the Times says, to $60,000 a year, of which the working man, going to his daily labor, pays more than the millionaire would argue as low a state of intelligence among the people as there is in the Timer.

"A Question of Privilege."

Young men should never neglect their opportunities, and of these, the opportunities to get their names before the public should Vessels going to the West Indies carry be especially cherished. It may be a friendly act to put a young man's name, in good con pany, to a public call to give a concert which he had expressed himself much in favor of, for a charitable purpose; but it can not be expected that for any such considerations he is to lose the opportunity to come before the public again, in a protest against the liberty taken with his name; killing two birds, as it were. To be invited into good company is well: but how much more the public will be impressed by a refdsal! It is almost equal to the managerial economy of "Manager Crummles," who, when "Nicholas Nickleby announced his intention to leave the Ports mouth boards, thought it an absolute waste of opportunities that he was not allowed to make at least six last appearances out of the oceasion. Any unjust imputations on the call, and consequent damage to a benevolent object, are of course, not to be regarded for a moment in such an opportunity; but the vicarious desire to represent the sufferings of a class might have been omitted, for fortunately the feeling exhibited does not represent any class

That a revolutionary chief, who must be aware that he is playing at the end of a tether which is held by Louis Napoleon, should expose himself so cheaply in a double game, does not argue the utmost discretion.

As the work of devastation progressed, multitudes of citizens assembled, hundreds of whom joined assiduously in aiding the enterprise. At first a party of the police offered resistance, but were attacked with rocks, one of which struck policeman Joseph Friese upon the stomach, inflicting a wound which may prove fatal. The police succeeded in arresting three of the rioters, John Wickmer, Leonard Lambert and Charles Hellard. In the affray, some twenty shots were fired by the "stars," to intimidate the crowd, but happily no one was hit. A large crowd achappily no one was hit. A large crowd ac-companied the officers and their prisoners to the police-station, and a disposition is said to have been evinced to effect a rescue, but the attempt was not made.

The path of the destroying mob was marked by blazing bonfires, in which were consuming the wreck of the smashed furniture of the houses just sacked. At Second and Almond, on Almond, between Third and Fourth, or Fourth at Almond, on Myrtle near Eighth, and at still other localities, these fires were and at still other localities, these area were successively rising, illuminating the scenes of sack and destruction, and attracting ad-ditional multitudes of wandering citizens and women, and even children. The Great Eastern Up for a Market. The Great Easters Up for a Market.

The Directors of the Great Eastern, says the New York Times, resisting the attractions of Philadelphia, its anthracite and its $30,000, were enamored of Baltimore and its Cumberland coal, and not indisposed to coquette feebly with Norfolk. They sent an agent accordingly to the Monumental City, offering to send thither the wondrous vessel, in consideration of the authorities bestowing your it and atowing swaw it it 2500 times of offering to send thither the wondrous vessel, in consideration of the authorities bestowing upon it, and stowing away in it, 2,500 tuns of semi-bituminous coal. The Directors alleged that they were the more willing to make this move, inasmuch as they had a half-formed purpose of placing the ship in service between Norfolk and England; a project that rendered communication with Southern people and views desirable.

To these seductions Baltimore has turned a deaf ear. It is indisposed to gratify its curiosity at a serious outlay of its metals and minerals; and, least of all, to abet a plan of raising Norfolk, with its vast natural advantages, into dangerous rivalry with its own promising future. Baltimore, we conceive, has done wisely.

There may possibly be two opinions as to the dignity of the policy adopted in this instance by the managers of the great ship. They clearly discard all pretensions to that public spirit and liberality which alone distinguish the merchant from the peddler. The ship is exhibited upon the narrow principles of a puppet show.
